The term has been applied to periods of economic expansion and contraction of previous economic cycles. This term is usually employed to describe a period of sustained stagnation which often follows a period of economic growth. Similar periods are the Malthusian stagnation (1750–1850) and the Great Depression (1929–1939). There was also a significant 'Lost Decade' in the United Kingdom in the 1980s. Major causes The most popular explanation for the phenomenon is that it was caused by a sudden shift in the dynamics of the demand for consumer goods. The popularity of the consumption-driven "new economy" of the late 1990s contributed to the growing perception of the Lost Decade. Also important were: Major decreases in consumer confidence. An unusual glut of overstored inventories that did not have room to appreciate. The end of the Baby Boomer generation. Lost decade by country Australia The economy of Australia was generally stagnant between 1990 and 2000. The terms "Lost Decade" and "Great Depression" are sometimes used. Since 2000, Australia has witnessed a boom in terms of economic growth and a stock market boom, with many commentators calling it a "new economy". Brazil One of the regions that experienced the Lost Decade was Brazil, where the economic growth reached a peak in 1998. The government ran fiscal and monetary policies to boost consumption and employment. Chile
