Elderly patients with hypertension have a high prevalence of neuropathy and are prone to developing neurogenic orthostatic hypotension. Therefore, antihypertensive drugs with the additional effect of reducing blood pressure to decrease the possibility of developing neurogenic orthostatic hypotension are useful. Eplerenone, a selective aldosterone blocker, inhibits the increase of blood pressure caused by water retention, and has a stronger selectivity for mineralocorticoid receptors than spironolactone. Eplerenone reduces the blood pressure dose-dependently but does not significantly affect the volume of water excretion. The antihypertensive effect of the combination therapy with eplerenone and perindopril was evaluated in 90 elderly patients (60 +/- 10 years old) with mild to moderate essential hypertension. After 6 weeks of a placebo run-in period and a 4-week treatment period with a placebo or perindopril 4 mg/ f30f4ceada
