upper lip region. The embryology of the upper lip and the upper gingiva is briefly reviewed and an account is given of the underlying causative mechanisms leading to spontaneous perforation of the upper lip and the hard palate at the time of birth. This is the first report of such lesions occurring in association with both the primary and the permanent dentitions. The patients were treated with the use of a maxillofacial vacuum extractor. The purpose of the study was to advise an obstetric physician about the value of the vacuum extractor in preventing spontaneous perforation and injury to the fetus.
